

CHALLENGING TURBULENT TIMES: TOWARDS A FRAMEWORK FOR GIRL-LED TRANSNATIONAL DIALOGUES TO COMBAT SEXUAL VIOLENCE

Claudia Mitchell, McGill University

ABSTRACT

Turbulent times in relation to sexual violence in the lives of girls and young women call for solidarity and global action. One of the legacies of globalization is the increased recognition of a borderless world which erases an ‘over there’ and ‘over here’, and which challenges some of the distinctions between the idea of a Global North and a Global South. In this article, I want to begin to offer an analysis of issues of sexual violence that frames the possibilities for research teams working with girls and young women across the Global North and the Global South and at the same time highlighting the possibilities for North-North and South-South learnings. What would a ‘circles within circles’ approach and what kinds of strategies are useful for sustaining such a strategy in combating sexual violence? In particular how can such a framework support dialogue? In order to address these questions the article suggests a practical framework based on a set of projects and in so doing draws attention to the need for a public voice for girls and young women that is framed within an activist arena.

CONTEXT

One of the legacies of globalization is the increased recognition of a sometimes borderless world which erases an ‘over there’ and ‘over here’, and which diminishes some of the distinctions between the idea of Global North and Global South. Nowhere is this more apparent than in concerns about the well-being of girls and young women in relation to sexual violence. In the Canadian context, for example, we have become increasingly aware of the shameful situation of the many missing and murdered Indigenous girls and women, and statistics that note that Indigenous women are 2.5 times more likely to be victims of violence,¹ and 6 times more likely to be killed,² than non-Indigenous women. The rates of violent crime against women aged 15 to 24 are 42% higher than rates for women aged 25 to 34, and nearly double the rates of women aged 35 to 44.³ This concern for the well-being of girls and young women was evident at a roundtable on gender and circumpolarity –convened by the Gender Forum at the University of Mid-Sweden in October 2015. In bringing together feminist scholars from Norway, Sweden, Russia, Finland, and Canada it was clear that while the idea of ‘north’ occupies very different meanings in these various countries (particularly in relation to Indigenous and non-Indigenous peoples), there are many critical convergences when it comes to the lives of girls and young women, with high rates of sexual violence, and challenges to their well-being, clearly at the top of the list. Speaking of the popular perception that Nordic girls are the “ones who won the lottery”, Finnish scholar Elina Oinas (2011) reminds us of the increasing recognition of the limitations of talking about these critical convergences about ‘the north’ in the absence of dialogue with and about the social and material contexts of ‘the south.’⁴ We know that worldwide these numbers are particularly shocking in relation to girls and young women: over 120 million girls (one in ten) report some form of sexual violence.⁵

¹ Violence Against Women in Canada Fact Sheet, Status of Women Canada (2013), p. 2. Available at: <http://www.swc-cfc.gc.ca/rc-cr/pub/violence-canada-eng.pdf>

² Homicide in Canada, 2014, Statistics Canada, p.14. Available at: <http://www.statcan.gc.ca/pub/85-002-x/2015001/article/14244-eng.pdf>

³ [57] Violence Against Women, 2013, Statistics Canada. Available: <http://www.statcan.gc.ca/daily-quotidien/130225/dq130225a-eng.htm>

The Sustainable Development Goals (SDGs)⁶ that call for good health, well-being, and gender equality highlight the significance of a global agenda. With the transition from the Millennium Development Goals to the SDGs, girls’ completion of secondary education is now positioned as a key strategy to achieving the entire 2030 Agenda. The 2016 UNFPA State of the World Population report, *10: How our Future Depends on a Girl at this Decisive Age*⁷ identifies the age of 10 as a critical turning point in girls’ lives. The girls who were 10-years-old at the start of the SDGs in 2015 will be 25 years old by 2030. During this transition from girlhood to adulthood, a number of decisions will affect girls’ experiences and social positions related to puberty, schooling, sexual health, marriage, childbirth, and entry into the paid workforce. The success of the SDGs depends on investing in policies, institutions and strategies that support girls, as well as their families and communities through these decisions. But what might sustainability look like in the context of addressing sexual violence in this global context and what strategies might be particularly promising in relation to what have come to be called ‘turbulent times’ for girls and young women? In this article, I consider one area of promise and hope, that being dialogue that starts with and through girls and young women themselves. In so doing I draw on instances where this dialogue is currently happening in a six year partnership project Networks for Change and Well-being: Girl-led ‘From the Ground Up’ Policy to Address Sexual Violence in Canada and South Africa, and point to the development of a framework that I refer to as ‘circles within circles’⁸ and which seeks to keep this type of dialogue going between and among girls and young women across several country contexts.

Networks for Change: Girl-led Learnings Across Two Countries

I start with a short description of “Networks for change and wellbeing: Girl-led ‘from the ground up’ policy making in addressing sexual violence in Canada and South Africa” (hereafter referred to as Networks for Change). This is a six-year, international and interdisciplinary partnership led by McGill University in Canada and the University of KwaZulu-Natal (UKZN) in South Africa, with partnership made up of universities in Canada and South Africa, girl-focused organizations in each country, and several key national and international organizations and stakeholders

⁴ Oinas, E. (2011). The girls who won the lottery. Paper presented at the conference on Contemporary, Girls, Embodiment and Social Change. Helsinki.

⁵ <http://www.unwomen.org/en/what-we-do/ending-violence-against-women/facts-and-figures>

⁶ <https://sustainabledevelopment.un.org/?menu=1300>

⁷ https://www.unfpa.org/sites/default/files/pub-pdf/The_State_of_World_Population_2016_-_English.pdf

⁸ Here I borrow from the title of Margot Ely’s (1991) Doing qualitative research: Circles within circles. London and New York: Routledge

responsible for policy and programming related to girls' lives. As a participatory research project, Networks for Change seeks to understand and address sexual violence against girls and young women in rural South African and in various Indigenous contexts in Canada. While the two country contexts are different in many ways, there are some dramatic convergences. South Africa is known to have one of the highest rates of sexual assault in the world, with adolescent girls between the ages of 12 and 17 being particularly at risk, and there is a persistent and, in a sense, unrelenting possibility of sexual violence that runs counter to girls' safety and security in schools and communities (Moletsane, Mitchell, & Lewin, 2015). Similarly, investigations into the lives of girls in Canada reveal that girls, especially those who are marginalized as a result of race and disability, experience many subtle and overt forms of violence, particularly in the context of relational and community violence (Berman & Jiwani, 2002; Morrison, 2011). Because much of this violence - occurring in schools, the community, in intimate settings, and on the street - can be so pervasive, victimization can easily go unnoticed. Indeed, girls themselves often accept violence or fail to identify it as such when it occurs (Berman & Jiwani, 2002; Wolfe & Chiodo, 2008). In their review, Collin-Vézina, Dion, and Trocmé (2009) found an estimated 25–50% child sexual abuse prevalence rate in Aboriginal adults surveyed in several communities across Canada over the past 20 years. Aboriginal women continue to face high rates of sexual assault and abuse: they are eight times more likely than non-Aboriginal women to be killed by an intimate partner (Sinha & Statistique Canada, 2013). Across Canada, commercial sexual exploitation of Aboriginal youth and children forms more than 90% of the visible sex trade (Kingsley & Mark, 2000). Downe (2008) highlights how Aboriginal girls remain vulnerable to violence because often the racism that is directed at them is sexualized. Aboriginal women confront a constellation of factors that contribute to sexual violence: colonization and its components of patriarchy, racism, and sexism; residential schools; and historical trauma; Bill C-31 that determines Indian status and its accompanying band compensation, infrastructure, support, as well as access to their community of origins. Many girls do not report sexual attacks at all because of the complex jurisdictional issues on and near reservations. Similar to the situation of many girls in South Africa, displacement is a concern. Aboriginal girls are pushed into extremely dangerous situations because of policies (e.g. Bill C-31) that force them to move away from their communities; they are isolated in situations of heightened danger stemming from sexualized racism, sexism, poverty, and through criminalization where historical dislocation and devaluation collide.

What is of concern to the partners in Networks for Change is that the statistics on sexual violence for girls under the age of 18 in both country contexts are shocking and call for an intensifying of effort in relation to addressing the lived realities of girls who are marginalized and who suffer from persistent insecurity, injustice, and abuse of power at the local level in otherwise democratic states. The partnership aims to influence the ways in which the voices of girls can inform local, national, global and virtual communities in relation to curbing sexual violence. Thus, to understand the dynamics in the two contexts, the Networks for Change project seeks to study and advance the use of innovative approaches to programming, knowledge-production, policy making and communication in addressing sexual violence amongst girls and young women. While sexual violence is a global issue, the partnership specifically interrogates the ways in which the participation of girls in democratic societies could be and indeed must be transformative. Working with girl-led initiatives addressing gender violence in two democratic country contexts, Canada and South Africa, the program focuses on ‘from the ground up’ policy-making organized around ‘girl-led’ methodologies such as participatory video and cellphilm, photo-voice and digital storytelling. (See also Delange, Mitchell & Moletsane, 2015; Mitchell, DeLange & Moletsane, 2015). In Canada, the project is organized around fieldsites in 4 provinces, Nova Scotia, Saskatchewan and British Columbia. In South Africa, the research project is organized around three rural school communities in the KwaZulu-Natal, the Free State and Eastern Cape provinces. In this project there are 3 different circles of players and actors, with girls and young women at the center of the dialogue.

- (1) Researchers from girl-led projects in 2 countries (Canada and South Africa)
- (2) Key Canadian and South Africa partner NGOs /regional organizations
- (3) A global organization focusing on girls and young women and sexual violence (UNGEI)

Learnings: In the first three years of Networks for Change there have been a number of key learnings, based on what the girls and young women saying and producing through their videos, cellphilm, exhibitions, policy posters and action briefs (Mitchell, de Lange, & Moletsane, In Press; Moletsane & Mitchell, In Press).

Urgency: Perhaps at the most basic level, what we are seeing is that the time frames for girls and young women are very different from what is typically seen in adult-driven projects. There is an urgency so that the participants are typically action-oriented; they want to see things happen. Many of the data-gathering events take place as part of residential weekend events or week-long workshops during the school holidays. This type of scheduling allows for the type of intensity that we often seeing. The participants want to finish their cellphilm or poster and are anxious to move the productions to the next level. While there is rich evidence from the literature on youth activism of this type of intensity and ‘youth-led’ commitment, we highlight it here because so much of the work of this project is outside of the DIY (or do it yourself movement) in that the events are typically adult organized (within the project) but can still be girl-led.

Risk-taking: Another key feature of the work links to the recognition that young girls and young women are more likely to be risk-takers and innovative in relation to issues that affect their lives in ways that adults might not be. We have seen this in the vast range of technologies they have been willing to test out and the artistic platforms that they have seized when it has been possible to speak out. The idea that they have been keen to try photovoice and cellphilm and digital storytelling is a good example of their risk-taking and especially in addressing issues that could be considered very controversial in the community.

Sexual violence is not a single issue for girls and young women: Something that has also been critical is the fact that the participants do not see sexual violence as something as a single issue. Rather it is entangled in issues of poverty, race, pregnancy, HIV and AIDS. Participants want to talk about their own sense of themselves in their communities, relationships with family, and poverty. In both country contexts the idea of land dispossession becomes a feature of colonial and patriarchal structures in the everyday lives of Indigenous girls and young women.

Future orientation: One of the most common narratives across a range of field sites is concerns about their future. The work is not just now but must also be ‘what next?’ As we consider our positionalities as researchers in this work, this future oriented work highlights the responsibilities of researchers and practitioners.

Dialogue: Talking with and talking to are key features of this work. While this is of course related to the significance of ensuring that cellfilms and photo exhibitions are viewed by community members, dialogue across sites and across country contexts is also key. In the second year of the project, for example, Canadian young women from the National Indigenous Young Women’s Council visited South Africa and met up with young women from the Girls Leading Change group at Nelson Mandela Metropolitan University. During the second and third years of Network for Change, Indigenous young women from Canada were interns in South Africa and participated in the fieldwork. In the third year of the project Girls Leading Change visited a university site in the US. What we are seeing is how valuable this aspect of the project in that there is so more awareness of the national and international politics attached to combating sexual violence. In the Networks for Change project, for example, indigenous young women in Canada and South Africa are working together to create an international advisory panel on indigenous girls leading change in the area of sexual violence. While some of the participants have met face-to-face as I note here, what they are also seizing on is the value of social media to keep the alliance active.

Expanding the Circles Within Circles Network: A Practical Framework

While Network for Change and Well-being has been contributing to the idea of ‘girl-led’ engagement in relation to two country contexts, one in the Global North and one in the Global South, it is an area that clearly requires greater focus in relation to ‘from the ground up policy making’. What can be learned by looking across a variety of country contexts and how can this work inform policy across a variety of policy contexts that pertain to sexual violence (education, health, social development, immigration, and justice)? We also need to know more about how girls and young women who are at a particular stage of their lives can still be part of the policy cycle and what difference the various contexts (education, health, etc.) make. Finally, we need to know more about the sustainability of these initiatives which, so often, are simply project-by-project. What difference would it make to have national, regional, and global partners in this work?

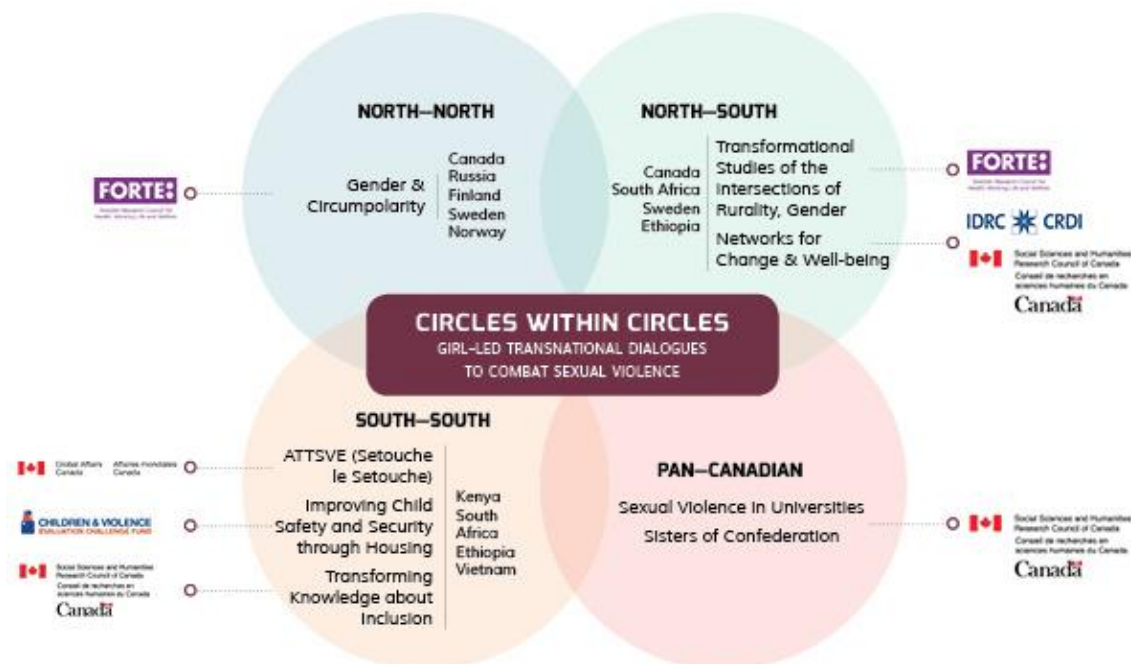

The national and global contexts in which I am working have afforded opportunities for projects with girls and young women that seek to ensure that this work is girl-led. This has meant refining participatory visual methods as approaches that capture local knowledge, and that help to make that knowledge available for others through exhibitions, screenings, and digital curation. As can be seen in Figure 2 these various projects have North-North, North-South, South-South, and pan-national configurations. I offer this configuration as an example of the types of transnational that would be possible building on a series of already existing projects and partnerships.

These initiatives are organized through 4 main configurations:

Figure 2

But what kinds of activities would help to facilitate the various forms of dialogue needed to support transnational perspectives? Below I list several types of activities and initiatives that could be carried out within a Circles Within Circles framework:

Residential Think Tanks: At the heart of this type of project is the idea of bringing together key players from each of the 3 circles in dialogue with girls and young women. It is meant to set the stage for expanding the dialogue and interplay with girls and young women representing already-existing girls’ advisory panels involved in participatory visual work on sexual violence. The focus of such an event is to build momentum and solidarity between and amongst the girls and young women and participants representing the 3 circles, particularly in relation to advancing girl-led media making and dialogue. Such an event can also show-case what is already happening and serve as a foundation for working together both for media production in relation to policy change and for embarking upon a way to capture community and policy dialogue.

Fieldwork through Girl-Focused Media-Making Workshops: A key component would be follow-up fieldwork, based on a series of girl-focused media making workshops taking place in 6-9 countries, building on the well-established digital practices of Networks for Change and especially the use of the cellphones to produce short cellphilms. The fieldwork and media-making training could be facilitated over a period of several months through digital workshops at which groups of girls and young women at each site will use cellphones, tablets or other devices to create cellphilms to ‘picture well-being’. These workshops would not simply be about media making but also about dialogue and the significance of images that girls and young women want to produce to inform transnational dialogue about combating sexual violence. A special feature of the project is to make sure that there is an opportunity for a follow-up workshop in each setting where cellfilms can be screened, discussed, and, in some cases, even ‘revised’ through what has been described elsewhere as a ‘speaking back’ method. (Mitchell, De Lange & Moletsane, in press)

Creating an Online Web Portal: Ensuring good digital and social media platforms is also critical. An online portal can as a communication tool for the Network, but could also serve as a blog and gallery space for Digital Exhibitions. Such a gallery space could include cellfilms and other digital media from the 6-9 countries represented, and addressing critical issues related to sexual violence as identified by girls and young women.

Producing Policy Briefs and Support-to-Policy Webinars: An important feature of this work is ‘getting the word out’ through for example policy briefs and briefing papers organized around key themes such as the following: (a) Girls and media making in under-resourced settings; (b) Evidence for ‘from the ground up policy making’; (c) Girls and young women as knowledge producers in the area of sexual violence. This work could support knowledge translation through a series of method-focused webinars designed for different audiences including other researchers, policy makers and girl-led activist groups.

Discussion

The idea of dialogue and its significance in the learnings within Networks for Change points to the importance of supporting and sustaining dialogue in innovative ways. Here we might think of youth and political activism and the notion of the public voice of girls and young women. To date this has been studied largely in the arena of online activism and youth studies (vs a focus on girls and young women). Rheingold (2008) and Jenkins, Purushotma, Weigel, Clinton, and Robison (2009) note, for example, that when adolescents and young adults engage with online participatory cultures and digital communication (blogging, social media networking, instant-messaging and online sharing of user-generated content), they are learning to develop a public voice. (See also Caron et al, 2016). Civic engagement (political activism, deliberation, problem solving) requires the effective use of a public voice (Levine, 2008; Rheingold, 2008). Levine (2008) observes that “a public voice is always one that can persuade other people--beyond the closest friends and family--to take action on shared issues” (p. 120). Levine differentiates between a private voice as one that is not intended to interest a community or to address broader concerns. An example of a private voice, Levine explains, is an e-mail or a social networking site that is meant for people close to the one writing the message. By contrast, a political blog is an example of a public voice, where the author expresses opinions/perspectives on current issues to draw or influence a larger audience. Levine makes the point that a public voice is not limited to addressing political matters, but also comprises cultural production, where engaged people come together in communities or associations. Topics thus extend beyond politics to include discussing bad software, how to fix technical problems, and poor customer service, for example, but of course they can also focus on the local or national contexts for sexual violence. As has been noted elsewhere (Mitchell, De Lange & Moletsane, In Press) much of this work on public voice and civic engagement remains gender neutral, or privileging male youth as participants. In studies that do focus on the participation of girls and young women in addressing gender violence, the notion of how this work can inform policy and programming is typically neglected or offered as ‘next steps’.

The example of Networks for Change responds to the idea of young women and activism in relation to sexual violence which has been an understudied area of youth activism, and locates the work within an emerging body of work on young women as activists (see MacKay, 2011; Taft, 2010; Trigg, 2010). As Taft observes in Rebel Girls: “Girls’ activism is an extremely underexplored scholarly topic, largely invisible in the academic literatures on girlhoods and on social movements. Research in the growing field of girls’ studies has focused primarily on girls’ self-esteem and psychology, sexuality and sexual behavior, friendships, schools and peer relationships, media consumption, production and cultural practice, and issues of growing up and constructing identities in various contexts” (p.8). As she goes on to comment: “These works often describe girls’ acts of resistance to dominant gender norms, or address girls’ consumption of commodified versions of feminism, but very few have made girls’ politics or political identities the central focus of study” (p. 8). She describes activist strategies of girls and young women in North America and Latin America where girls spoke about the value of political education as an activist tool, highlighting the place of teach-ins, cultural events, screening of films and so on. She notes one significant difference between girls in North America and girls in Latin America where girls have a mastery of political language. As she writes: “Compared to their North American peers, Latin American girls have more places where they can practice expressing their critical knowledge, expand on their skills of political analysis, and learn more extensive political vocabularies” (109). As a consequence, Latin American girls expressed more confidence in formal political spaces than North American girls, who struggled to find the right political language to voice their needs and concerns.

Taft’s comparisons offer a compelling reason to seek transnational perspectives. A Circles Within Circles framework as described above offers the opportunity to deepen an understanding of what girl-led transnational perspectives on combating sexual violence could look like and how this work is specifically linked to dialogue and activism. At the same time, there may be a number of critical questions to ask: To what extent, for example can there be an activist agenda to combat sexual violence for girls and young women who are at the very same time themselves discovering and performing their sexual identities? How do we ensure that ‘girl-led’ does not mean that adults have no responsibility? Influencing policy may vary greatly from one country to the other, or even from one context to another in the same country. How might the framework above help to accommodate these differences?

Conclusion

The need for new strategies for enhancing and sustaining the engagement of girls and young women to combat sexual violence is critical. As we are reminded daily through social media and newscasts, the situation for girls and young women remains precarious and it is tempting to think of the idea of combating the everyday occurrences of sexual violence as being outside the range of possibilities for ordinary citizens and especially for girls and young women. As the title of the article suggests, these are turbulent times. However, as projects such as Networks for Change are suggesting, the notion of change starts with dialogue: girls in dialogue with researchers, teachers, community leaders, and also in dialogue and with each other. The possibilities for learning across contexts has been highlighted here, building on one case study of a Canada-South Africa partnership, but with the suggestion of how this type of work is being expanded from a North-South configuration to one that could include North-North and South-South linkages.

Acknowledgements: I am grateful to the Pierre Elliot Trudeau Foundation for its support for the idea of a ‘circles within circles’. This work was also supported through a Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council of Canada (SSHRC) grant (award number 895-2013-3007) and an International Development Research Centre (IDRC) grant (award number 107777-001).

REFERENCES

- Berman, H., & Jiwani, Y. (2002). In the Best Interests of the Girl Child Phase II Report. The Alliance of Five Research Centres on Violence. Retrieved from http://www.unb.edu/fredericton/arts/centres/mmf/_resources/pdfs/bestinterest_e.pdf
- Caron, C., Raby, R., Mitchell, C., Thewissen-Leblanc, S. & Prioletta, R. (2016). From concept to data: Sleuthing social change-oriented youth voice on YouTube. Journal of Youth Studies, <http://dx.doi.org/10.1080/13676261.2016.118424>
- Collin-Vézina, D., Dion, J., & Trocmé, N. (2009). Sexual abuse in Canadian Aboriginal communities: A broad review of conflicting evidence. Pimatisiwin: A journal of Aboriginal and Indigenous Community Health, 7(1), 27–47. Retrieved from <http://constellation.uqac.ca/3232/1/Pimatisiwin%20CollinDionTrocmé-2.pdf>
- De Lange, N., Mitchell, C., & Moletsane, R. (2015). Girl-led strategies to address campus safety: Creating action briefs for dialogue with policy makers. Agenda, 29(3), 118-127.
- Downe, P. (2008). La violence exercée contre les filles autochtones: Le problème, sa face cachée, les sources d'espour et les interventions possible. by D. Damant, S. Gravel, E. Harper. Montréal: Presses de L'univeristé du Québec.
- Jenkins, H., Purushotma, R., Weigel, M., Clinton, K., & Robison, A. J. (2009). Confronting the challenges of participatory culture: Media education for the 21st century. Mit Press. Retrieved from <http://files.eric.ed.gov/fulltext/ED536086.pdf>
- Kingsley, C., & Mark, M. (2000). Sacred Lives: Canadian Aboriginal children and youth speak our about sexual exploitation. National Aboriginal Consultation Project. Vancouver, BC: Save the Children Canada.
- Levine, P. (2008). A public voice for youth: The audience problem in digital media and civic education. Civic life online: Learning how digital media can engage youth, 119–138.
- Mackay, F. (2011). A movement of their own: Voices of young feminist activists in the London Feminist Network. Interface: a journal for and about social movements, 3(2), 152–179. Retrieved from <http://eprints.uwe.ac.uk/23372/1/Interface-3-2-Mackay.pdf>
- Mitchell, C., De Lange, N. & Moletsane, R. (In press). Girls and young women addressing sexual violence in South Africa: Gender activism in the making. In E. Oinas (ed). What politics? Youth and political activism. Amsterdam, The Netherlands: Brill.
- Mitchell, C. De Lange, N., & Moletsane, R. (2017). Participatory visual methodologies: Social change, community and policy. Thousand Islands: Sage.
- Mitchell, C., & De Lange, N. (2015). Interventions that address sexual violence against girls and young women: Mapping the issues. Agenda, 29(3), 3-12.
- Moletsane, R., & Mitchell, C. (In press). Researching sexual violence with girls in rural South Africa: Some methodological challenges in using participatory visual methodologies. In H. D. Shapiro (Ed.), The handbook on violence in education: Forms, factors, and preventions. Hoboken, NJ: Wiley Blackwell Publishing.

- Moletsane, R., Mitchell, C., & Lewin, T. (2015). Gender violence, teenage pregnancy and gender equity policy in South Africa: privileging the voices of women and girls through participatory visual methods. In J. Parkes (Ed.). Gender Violence in Poverty Contexts. London and New York: Taylor and Francis
- Morrison, C. (2011). Avatars and the cultural politics of representation: girlhood identity in social networking spaces (Doctoral dissertation, Memorial University of Newfoundland).
- Rheingold, H. (2008). Using participatory media and public voice to encourage civic engagement. Civic life online: Learning how digital media can engage youth, 97–118. Retrieved from <http://www.issuelab.org/resources/881/881.pdf>
- Sinha, M., & Statistique Canada. (2013). Mesure de la violence faite aux femmes: tendances statistiques. Statistique Canada. Retrieved <http://www.statcan.gc.ca/pub/85-002-x/2013001/article/11766-fra.htm>
- Taft, J. K. (2010). Rebel girls: Youth activism and social change across the Americas. New York, NY: NYU Press.
- Trigg, M. K. (Ed.). (2010). Leading the Way: Young Women's Activism for Social Change. New Brunswick, NJ: Rutgers University Press.
- Wolfe, D. A., & Chiodo, D. (2008). Sexual harassment and related behaviors reported among youth from grade 9 to grade 11. Vancouver, B.C.: Centre for Addiction and Mental Health. Retrieved from https://www.researchgate.net/publication/228586234_Sexual_Harassment_and_Related_Behaviours_Reported_Among_Youth_from_Grade_9_to_Grade_11